Roxanne Stewart-Johnson is an emergent filmmaker and motion graphic artist who fled domestic and psychiatric abuse in Jamaica with only what she could carry, including a small child. After winning refugee protection in Canada, in a precedent-setting case involving the United Nation's Rappateur, she tells her dramatic story in a way will rivet and inspire viewers, especially those who can relate to psychiatric oppression. Since coming to Canada she completed a masters in journalism at Ryerson University in Toronto and hopes to pursue human rights advocacy through media.
